From other sources it was learned that the inventory of all the postage stamps in the office had been completed and that it howed that stamps to the value of $18,502 were missing, which, together with the rash "seficit, will bring the total amount of L u sbery's stealings to $47,500. In montion to this the sum of $500, which has been contributed to the Pearson Monument Fund, of which Lounsbery was the custodian, is missing.

Postmaster Van Cott expects to complete his investigations to day, when he says he will prepare a statement showing the amount of the defalcation to a penny. There has been some talk of the bonds men resisting the myment of the claim which Postmaster Van Cott has against them, but this idea is ridiculed by the Post-Office authorities.

They say that the bond was a special ironelad obligation, which Postmaster Van Cott compelled his cashier, assistant cashier and the cashier of the money order department to give when he took the office. There is no chance that they can experience in the postmaster of the money order department to give when he took the office.
